This information was gathered as part of the Wellcome Library survey of Medical Archives and Manuscripts, 1600-1945 in repositories in the Greater London area. This survey was undertaken during the 1990s and thus some of the details may be out of date. Researchers are advised to check current repository contact details on ARCHON.

The manuscript collections in the British Library, formerly part of the British Museum, date from the foundation of the Museum in 1753. Of the so-called Foundation collections, only the Sloane has significant relevant content. The Cottonian and Harleian collections consist largely of material from the Middle Ages and sixteenth century. The Sloane collection, by contrast, has a great deal of seventeenth and early eighteenth century medical-related material, as well as earlier manuscripts. The Additional manuscripts (Add.), acquired from 1756 onwards, were numbered from where Sloane left off (MS 4100), and the two collections have therefore been amalgamated in the arrangement below. Other accruing series are the Egerton Manuscripts (Eg.) and Additional Charters and Rolls (Add. Ch.). These are described in the same printed catalogues as the Additional manuscripts and have therefore been included with them in the present arrangement.

Other collections acquired from 1757 onwards, but kept separate from the Additional manuscripts, include a certain amount of relevant material, which is described at the end of the entry, together with the small quantity of such material in the Cotton and Harley collections.
